Gen. Robert Armstrong, in the Washington Union, side and for a short time edited that paper. Of this fact the Commonwealth thus speaks : When Mr. Ritchie-the great Nestor of the Democratic party-retired from the editorship of the Washington Union, the party selected Mr. Donelson as his successor. He discharged the duties of the position well and efficiently, and to the satisfaction his party, util the secession and and Free Soil appointments of Fresident Pierce made it impossible for him to render the administration a hearty support. Major Donelson, instead of leaving the Union office for the reason assigned by the Commonwealth, how to drive them off and, as the time indicated, left because the Democratic party compelled bim to leave, and that, too long hat. before the obnoxious appointments were made. In other words, he did not have the confidence of the party, and the party gave to understand that his room was more agreeable than his company. The cary man who has been thus unceremoniously kicked out of the Democratic ranks, will make a good enough | ecary's enemy candidate for the Know Nothings.

So odious was Donelson to the Democratic party, even as early as the summer of 1852, before the elecion of Gen. Pierce, that the Demograts in Congress would not elect him printer of the House, although he was then editor of the metropolitan newspaper, and the party had a large majority of the members. They refused to permit his name to be associated with his lamented partner, Gen. Armstrong, and ous air : gave the office to the latter. The editor of this paper nominated Gen. Armstrong to the House, and happens to know well what were the relations of Donelson at that time to the party. Gen. Armstrong was elected printer on the 27th day of August, 1855, some time before the election of Gen. Pierce. A short time after this very unequivocal indication of the feeling of the party towards Maj. Donelson, he sold his interest in the Washington Union to Gen. Armstrong and retired to private life, a sourcd and dissatisfied man.
